

LF Structural Variation

WHAT THIS SKILL MEANS

This skill is about not getting stuck using the same sentence pattern over and over. If every sentence starts the same way — “I think...,” “This is...” — your speech can sound flat, even when your ideas are good. Strong speakers shift between different sentence structures: sometimes the subject comes first, sometimes the focus is on what happened to something, sometimes a sentence starts with the part you want to emphasize.

WHAT TO TRY

- Notice if you keep starting sentences the same way, and consciously change it up
- Try a passive structure when you want to focus on the result, not who did it
- Try starting a sentence with the part you want to emphasize instead of the subject
- Vary clause order — sometimes the condition first, sometimes the result first

SENTENCE STARTERS

- “What really drives this is...”
- “The decision would be shaped by...”
- “It is the [specific factor] that matters most here...”
- “Were this policy to pass, the result would be...”

EXAMPLE IN ACTION

Disclosure builds trust between companies and applicants. What really drives this issue, though, is not the disclosure itself but whether applicants can act on that information — the decision would ultimately be shaped by how clearly it's written, not just whether it exists. Three different sentence shapes carry the argument here: a simple active claim, a fronted structure, and a passive construction — not one pattern repeated three times.
